Proponent's Argument

San Francisco's housing crisis is simple: rents and home prices have climbed faster than paychecks, and teachers, nurses, and multigenerational families are being priced out of the neighborhoods they grew up in or serve. Proposition C won't solve that alone, but it renews San Francisco's most significant source of funding for affordable housing.

For over a decade, the Housing Trust Fund has been San Francisco's foundation for building affordable housing, helping first-time buyers purchase a home, keeping first responders in the city they serve, and giving seniors a way to stay in their communities.

Prop C renews the Housing Trust Fund through 2058 and increases its annual funding to $125 million. Every year we wait, the fund stays capped while rents keep climbing.

Prop C does not raise anyone's taxes. It reallocates money the City already collects, and it is fiscally responsible by design. Funding only grows when the City's own property tax or general fund revenue grows. The City can pause or reduce contributions during a real budget deficit. This is a careful, sustainable plan, not a blank check.

That is why Prop C is a true consensus measure. It was placed on the ballot unanimously by the Board of Supervisors and supported by labor and housing advocates across the city.

Prop C will build and rehabilitate affordable housing, fund down payment assistance for teachers and first responders, provide rent assistance to prevent seniors from being displaced, convert vacant lots into real housing, and fund needed infrastructure.

Every dollar is legally dedicated to affordable housing and subject to independent audit.

This is the responsible way to keep San Francisco affordable. Vote YES on Prop C.

www.HomesforSF.com

Mayor Daniel Lurie
Supervisor Myrna Melgar
Assemblymember Catherine Stefani
*Rebecca Foster, CEO Housing Accelerator Fund
*Malcolm Yeung, CEO Chinatown Community Development Center

*For identification purposes only; author is signing as an individual and not on behalf of an organization.

Rebuttal to Proponent's Argument

The Yes campaign touts the long list of things Prop C could fund. That's nothing to brag about. Prop C gives the Fund more money, more responsibilities, and more eligible recipients — spreading taxpayer dollars across an ever-broader mission. The more things a program is asked to do, the harder it is to prioritize, measure results, and hold anyone accountable.

The promised "independent audit" is no substitute for performance standards. Prop C requires no minimum number of new homes, no maximum cost per unit, and no cost-effectiveness benchmark. An audit after the money is spent is no substitute for measurable results written into law.

Before committing billions in taxpayer dollars through 2058, voters must demand measurable results, cost accountability, and fiscal discipline.

Vote NO on Prop C.

The San Francisco Republican Party

Arguments are the opinions of the authors and have not been checked for accuracy by any official agency.
Arguments are printed as submitted. Spelling and grammatical errors have not been corrected.

Opponent's Argument

It Couldn't Do the Job It Had. Now It Wants a Bigger One.

San Francisco's Housing Trust Fund was established in 2012 to help working families afford housing. It has failed. Local reporting calls the fund "a letdown" and "an existing program that has yielded little." Since the fund's creation, the cost to build a single affordable unit in San Francisco has roughly doubled, running close to $1 million per unit today.

Instead of a fix, this measure doubles the fund's size, locks it in for 30 more years, and stretches it thinner:

– Raises the homebuyer income cap from 120% to 200% of "median income" — up to $402,000 for a family of four, in a city where the real median household income is $141,000.
– Let's the Board of Supervisors raise that cap again anytime, with no vote required.
– Opens the fund to new uses like city-owned "social housing" and co-ops, all competing for the same dollars.
– Swaps a specific, accountable neighborhood fund for a vague, open-ended one.

Nothing in the measure requires a single additional unit to get built. There's no unit target. No benchmark. Meanwhile, San Francisco remains tens of thousands of units short of its own housing goals.

A program that already failed at one job doesn't get fixed by giving it five new jobs and more money. Fix what's broken first.

Vote No on C.

The San Francisco Republican Party

Rebuttal to Opponent's Argument

Proposition C renews and expands a program San Francisco voters already created: the Housing Trust Fund, dedicated to building affordable homes, helping teachers and first responders become homeowners, and keeping seniors from losing their housing.

It includes real fiscal guardrails. The City can freeze contributions during a genuine budget deficit and reduce them by up to 10 percent in years when it draws on the Rainy Day Reserve.

Funding only grows when the City's own property tax or general fund revenue grow. This is not a blank check. It is a formula built for both growth and restraint. Every dollar is legally restricted to affordable housing, homeownership assistance, and rent relief.

San Francisco's housing costs can't wait. Teachers, nurses, and multigenerational families are being priced out right now, and the fund that helps them is set to run out.

That is why Prop C earned support from elected leaders, organized labor, and housing advocates citywide. It is the responsible, accountable way to keep this program going without raising anyone's taxes.

Vote YES on Prop C.

Supervisor Myrna Melgar
Assemblymember Matt Haney, Chair of the Housing and Community Development Committee
Bill Barnes, Non-Profit Housing Association of Northern California
*Nicholas Lake, Teacher
*Mario Flaherty, Secretary, San Francisco Firefighters Local 798

*For identification purposes only; author is signing as an individual and not on behalf of an organization.

Arguments are the opinions of the authors and have not been checked for accuracy by any official agency.
Arguments are printed as submitted. Spelling and grammatical errors have not been corrected.