REBUTTAL TO ARGUMENT IN FAVOR OF MEAURE P

Measure P's supporters say the measure will "protect what works," but the argument in favor mainly relies on broad promises instead of proving that extending local transactions and use tax and raising the sales tax is the only responsible option.

Measure P is framed as maintaining essential services - police, fire/paramedics, 911 response, street repairs, parks and youth/senior programs, and homelessness services. Those are important priorities. But voters should focus on whether Measure P renewal is necessary and whether it protects services in practice. "Costs have increased dramatically" is not a plan. The city should specify what service levels will change, what budget cuts or staffing adjustments are currently projected without Measure P, and why those impacts cannot be reduced through spending controls, operational efficiencies, or other revenue options.

The claim that funds "cannot be taken by the State" and that it is "local control" also does not guarantee fiscal discipline. Even with local revenue, city budgets can shift money around. Voters need strong, enforceable safeguards showing that Measure P dollars will be used for the stated categories at the levels promised.

The accountability points - annual audits, public disclosure, and citizen oversight - sound good, but they do not address effectiveness. Past promises should be backed by results: audits, compliance reports, and documented outcomes for emergency response times, street maintenance, and public safety staffing.

Renewal should come with measurable commitments and verified performance - not just assurances.
